

Barry Amiel & Norman Melburn Trust

Funding Procedure

The Barry Amiel & Norman Melburn Trust welcomes funding applications from individuals or institutions for projects which fall within the funding remit of the Trust.

The Trust funds a variety of projects which include conferences, seminars, publications, research, popular education, archiving, translations, art, culture and digital media. We recommend you review previous awards we have given to help you decide whether your project would be a good fit for the Trust. The Trust primarily funds projects undertaken by people and institutions based in the UK. However, we occasionally make exceptions for projects outside of the UK which are strongly aligned with our objectives.

Please note that the Trust does not award funds to subsidise the continuation or running of University/College courses; cover transportation costs to or from Conferences; or subsidise fees/maintenance for undergraduate or postgraduate students.

Trust Objectives

The general objectives of the Trust are to advance public education, learning and knowledge in all aspects of

- (a) the philosophy of Marxism
- (b) the history of socialism, and
- (c) the working class movement.

The trustees have adopted the following statement as a working translation of the Trust's objectives: Marxism is not a fixed interpretation of history and society but a critical method which generates a different critique in different periods and situations. As a philosophy, its purpose is to understand the world in order to change it. It is therefore a philosophy which takes creative account of other critiques of society as part of the reality which it seeks to understand and change.

Historically Marxism has sought to understand capitalist society, and the change which it has worked for has been to a socialist form of society. Its critique has now necessarily expanded to include twentieth-century socialist societies and the received Marxist tradition itself. These societies have played a central part in the history of socialism and the working class movement. The future, not only of such societies as they depart from the past, but of every society in which a new form of socialism is argued for or attempted in the future, will be a part of the history of socialism. The part played by the working class movement past, present, and future is, in itself, a proper object of study, both in its own right and as a part of the history of socialism and the study of Marxism.

Thus, the Trust's objectives may be seen as part of a continuing process of understanding the development of modern societies in the light of the intellectual and social movements which have sought and still seek to transform them to non-exploitative and egalitarian societies. The Trust's funds should be deployed accordingly.

Trust Strategic Priorities

In addition to the Trust Objectives, the Trust is also working towards the following strategic priority in its funding decisions.

The Trust will aim to ringfence 50% of funds for applications for projects with a strong focus on popular political education and on engagement with non-academic and non-activist audiences, especially those focused on reaching people and communities across the UK who are likely to face barriers to accessing education, learning and knowledge about the philosophy of Marxism, the history of socialism, the working class movement and other social movements seeking to bring about non-exploitative and egalitarian societies. These barriers could include educational, financial, geographical, or political cultural barriers.

Scope

Please bear in mind that the scope of our objectives includes all intellectual and social movements aiming to make modern societies non-exploitative and egalitarian, including but not limited to those focused on class, race, and equitable solutions to climate change, to name a few. Your project does not have to touch them all, but we'd like to understand how your work fits into our broader objectives.

Thematic Fund

In the January round, the Trust invites applications on a particular theme (in addition to issuing an open invitation). In the January 2025 funding round the theme is Building the Left, countering the far-right. Following the wave of violent far-right disturbances across England in summer 2024, the Trust encourages applications concerned with research and analysis on the drivers of the 'riots', as well as educational work that provides alternatives to racist, anti-immigration and Islamophobic politics. The Trust is especially interested in work in places most affected, which are often areas of multiple deprivation and with limited access to political education.
